ANNUAL REPORT OF THE
NEW YORK SOCIETY LIBRARY,

FOR THE YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1871.

In the last Annual Report submitted by the Chairman to the Trustees of this Library for the information of its shareholders, and of others who have availed themselves of the chartered rights originally granted to it, we endeavored to point out the indebtedness of the community to such an institution as this.

The advantages which it possesses as compared with private libraries were set forth. Its tendencies to promote a broader and more generous culture were shown. It is not its object to exclude the library in the home, but to supplement it, and to bring the privileges of wide-spread reading within the reach of all.

The provisions contained in the charter creating The New York Society Library were, by a wise anticipation, not only applicable to shareholders, but embraced others disposed to avail themselves of its privileges, subject to the regulations which related to the duties of the Trustees, and were adapted to the wants and convenience of subscribers for limited periods. This charter was granted in 1772. Its nucleus was "The Public Library," founded when Lord Bellamont was Governor of the Province of New York, about the year 1700. In 1729 a valuable addition was made to it, as stated in the historical notice to be found in the catalogue of the present institution, published in 1850. The Legislature of the State confirmed that charter in 1789. There are no known catalogues existing which furnish information of the number of volumes in the library at the commencement of the revolution. This is now upwards of 60,000 volumes. For many years the circulation of its books was confined to the city; but gradually it secured a foothold in the adjoining rural districts. These, from their business connections with this great metropolis, are in immediate communication with it, and their population is rapidly increasing. It includes a highly educated and reflecting class, whose literary tastes derive their chief aliment from this emporium; which is the source, relatively, both of their wealth and social influence. Wherever intellect is associated with refinement, taste with art, and the love of the æsthetic with generous impulses and a diffusive liberality, there are found those who resort to institutions like ours, and contribute to their support and expansion.

As was intimated in the report of last year, the basis of this institution limits its privileges, to some extent, to the wealthier classes in society. There is no intention of this kind in its administration; but the fact that it is not a circulating library thrown open to the public, and that a right to its privileges is secured only by the payment of a stipulated sum, tends to circumscribe its operations and impede its increase.

It must be remembered, however, that this very feature in this library secures a more discriminating selection of books than in libraries which have a more promiscuous circulation. Besides this, the Society Library is exercising its influence among the more highly educated and reflecting classes in the general community. It is from these classes that the influences proceed by which the character of our civilization is determined.

It will be seen, then, at once how important it is that the provisions here made should be as large and generous as possible—covering the entire field of literature, art, science, and religion.

There is another view to be taken of this subject. The value of such a library as this to our young men cannot be overestimated. Its tendency to substitute a pure and elevated intellectual pleasure, for those of a trivial, gross, or demoralizing character, is self-evident. An appeal is made in this view of the subject which must have its influence with every one who wishes to promote the moral purity of the community.

It is worthy of consideration also that there is no institution which occupies exactly the position of this. There are other libraries of immense value to the city; such as the Astor, the Historical, and the Mercantile Library; and also others in the course of formation. In regard to the two first-named, the books cannot be removed from within their walls. The last was originally designed for a special class, but it has become more general in its circulation, and is now conducted with a zeal and well-directed energy, which cannot fail to make it still more a success. We have above briefly shown wherein the New York Society Library has a somewhat distinctive character, which gives it a claim justly meriting public favor, and which supplies a want, therefore, in the community, which is to be met with in no other way. The constantly increasing number of similar institutions enlarges the number of readers by the opportunities and the inducements which they offer, and which have greater attractions than grosser pursuits and vicious pleasures. Care in the selection of books leads to a systematic use of them, and is an antidote, in a great degree, to a loose and desultory course of reading. The sensational productions of the day are, in a general sense, pernicious, and create an unsound appetite which grows by what it feeds upon. It may safely be asserted that but a small portion of such works have any lasting literary value. This is a matter which our Society Library keeps constantly in mind; and in this respect, consequently, its more gradual but healthy increase has this advantage, that the books on its shelves maintain their relative and unquestioned appreciation, both with regard to the present, and each successive year.

Professor Porter, in the opening sentence of his interesting work on "Books and Reading," observes that "if a South Sea Islander were suddenly set down in one of the great cities of Europe, one of the most incomprehensible things to him would be a public library." The author does not follow out the thought which at once suggests itself to the mind. It is because the library is the most characteristic exponent of civilization that it would be most difficult of comprehension to a savage. It is connected with ideas and relations utterly removed from the life of the barbarian. Its associations are with intellectual progress, refinement of manners, and purity of faith. It is, even in its most imperfect form, an impossibility in a savage community.

In the words of Wordsworth:

———"and books we know
Are a substantial world, both pure and good;
Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood,
Our pastimes and our happiness will grow."

It will thus be seen what a strong claim is made in behalf of this institution to the thoughtful consideration and wise liberality of our citizens. We would earnestly urge that there is here an object which might well enlist the sympathies and co-operation of those who desire to aid great enterprises for the public good. And in the disposition which our men of wealth make in reference to the distribution of their property, when the meritorious claims of useful, benevolent, and praiseworthy institutions are presented to their view, and they themselves are reaching that goal beyond which they can carry nothing out, shall not this, of which we are the present custodians, contributing as it does to the literary character and reputation of the city, find a place in their regard for its support and extension, and a generous provision in their wills?

In one of the neighboring cities of our country it has been very largely the practice among its men of wealth, not only to contribute to literary institutions during their life, but to make munificent provision for them in their wills. It is in this way that Harvard University and the great public library of Boston have been built up to a position of so much honor and importance.

In England, the peculiar character of her social institutions has led men of wealth to devote their property to the possible ennobling of their families. Here the tendency has been rather to associate one's name with some great charitable or literary enterprise. We wish this was more generally the case. We have reason to suppose that this library is already remembered in the wills of some of its patrons. Legacies of a few thousand dollars only, from some twenty or thirty of its liberal and public-spirited friends, would ensure to it a future of vastly increased usefulness and more prominent distinction.

Let it be the earnest and individual effort of its trustees, shareholders, and subscribers, to make The New York Society Library—the oldest institution of the kind in this State—in all respects an ornament and a celebrity in this metropolis of the United States.

The shareholders are referred to the Report of the Auditing Committee and Treasurer, hereto annexed, for information respecting the finances of the institution.
